11:30-13:00	Ministry of Industry, Trade and Tourism	International trade, the environment and our future well-being	Moderator: Xiana Méndez, Secretary of State for Trade at the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Tourism Arancha González Laya, Director International Trade Center David Taylor, New Zealand Government Martin Nesbit, Institute for European Environmental Policy (IEEP) Laura Merrill, International Institute for Sustainable Development (IISD)	How can trade be part of an effective solution in tackling environmental challenges? International trade and a healthy environment both reinforce each other. International trade can exert pressures on the environment but it can also promote environmental conservation and economic efficiency. Climate change may undermine trade, from natural disasters to fluctuations in crop production. Reinforcing international cooperation in trade_and_environment, policy coherence and a holistic approach is a must. Also important is the need for fair and transparent rules that maintain a level playing field (including the treatment of externalities) as it is the need to ensure that domestic policies aimed at fighting climate change create incentives for all producers to be more sustainable.
